The Power of a Point
By: Abbey Vielhaber

Why Is Pointing Important?
• Helps direct attention to what we see or are thinking about
• Helps bridge the gap between 1-2 word phrases

Why Do Children Point?
• To tell us something
• To ask a question
• To ask for something

How to Respond when your Child Points:
• Label what they are pointing at (ie: "A bird! It's flying!")
• Show them how to interact with that item/person (ie: "A little boy! Hi! What's your name?")
Comment on the action happening (ie: "He fell down. Oh no! Are you ok?")
- If you do ask a question, follow it with a response (ie: "What do you see? Oh! It's a dump truck!")

For Children With Limited Words, Avoid Saying:
- "What is it?/Who is that?/What's that?/What's happening?" without also modeling a response
- "Oo, Wow, I see, Cool, etc" without adding information (ie: "Wow, a bird!" or "I see-he's going down the slide!")

Ways to Encourage Pointing:
- Popping bubbles
- Touching objects or model pointing at/touching objects in books
- Opening pop-up wipes containers
- Model pointing at things and naming the object or action

Valentine’s Day and Meaningful Communication Skills

By Katie Spreen

A day devoted to telling others why you love and appreciate them?!?! Valentine’s Day is the perfect occasion to target communication skills while having fun with your kids! Here are some activities and communication tips to make your Valentine’s Day extra special:

Bake cookies together!

- Often times in speech-language therapy, we target skills such as following directions, responding to questions, and labeling vocabulary. Why? Well, these skills are a part of typical development, yes. But more importantly, they are necessary daily life skills! Baking is a great way to target these skills in a meaningful way.

- Before starting, talk about what you are going to bake and read the recipe out loud to your child.
• Give your child specific 1-2 step directions. “Get the milk and pour it into the large bowl” or “Dump the chocolate chips into the large bowl and mix the ingredients together”.

• Ask your child where certain ingredients are found in your house and where they come from. “Where do we keep milk?” or “Where do eggs come from?”

• Last year, I was shopping for a Valentine’s Day card to send to my nephew, Mason. After looking at a handful of cards, I decided that I should make Mason’s Valentine’s Day card. Mason loved getting a card in the mail from Aunt Katie and was surprised to open the card and find photos of his family! For a toddler, there is no better way to practice “talking” than when looking at meaningful photos.

Send a card to someone you love!

• I don’t know a 3 year old who doesn’t have a fascination with mailboxes, putting things into envelopes, and going to the post office. There is something about this process that sparks curiosity and imagination – I love it!

• Allow your child to pick a family member to send a card to. Talk about what is special about this person. Write down what your child says! For children that are not yet reading or writing, having an adult listen to them and write their words is powerful. It is a concrete way to convey “What you say matters to me.”

Enjoy and Happy Valentine's Day!
